University of Groningen

Religious Practices and Networks of Belonging in an Immigrant Congregation

Ritter, Christian; Kmec, Vladimír

Published in:
Journal of contemporary religion

DOI:
10.1080/13537903.2017.1298907

IMPORTANT NOTE: You are advised to consult the publisher's version (publisher's PDF) if you wish to cite from it. Please check the document version below.

Document Version
Publisher's PDF, also known as Version of record

Publication date:
2017

Link to publication in University of Groningen/UMCG research database

Citation for published version (APA):

Ritter, C., & Kmec, V. (2017). Religious Practices and Networks of Belonging in an Immigrant Congregation: the German-Speaking Lutheran Congregation in Dublin. Journal of contemporary religion, 32(2), 269-281. <https://doi.org/10.1080/13537903.2017.1298907>

Copyright

Other than for strictly personal use, it is not permitted to download or to forward/distribute the text or part of it without the consent of the author(s) and/or copyright holder(s), unless the work is under an open content license (like Creative Commons).

The publication may also be distributed here under the terms of Article 25fa of the Dutch Copyright Act, indicated by the "Taverne" license. More information can be found on the University of Groningen website: <https://www.rug.nl/library/open-access/self-archiving-pure/taverne-amendment>.

Take-down policy

If you believe that this document breaches copyright please contact us providing details, and we will remove access to the work immediately and investigate your claim.

Downloaded from the University of Groningen/UMCG research database (Pure): <http://www.rug.nl/research/portal>. For technical reasons the number of authors shown on this cover page is limited to 10 maximum.

Religious practices and networks of belonging in an immigrant congregation: the German-speaking Lutheran congregation in Dublin

Christian S. Ritter & Vladimir Kmec

To cite this article: Christian S. Ritter & Vladimir Kmec (2017) Religious practices and networks of belonging in an immigrant congregation: the German-speaking Lutheran congregation in Dublin, Journal of Contemporary Religion, 32:2, 269-281, DOI: 10.1080/13537903.2017.1298907

To link to this article: <https://doi.org/10.1080/13537903.2017.1298907>

Published online: 11 Apr 2017.

Submit your article to this journal ↗

Article views: 86

View related articles ↗

View Crossmark data ↗

Religious practices and networks of belonging in an immigrant congregation: the German-speaking Lutheran congregation in Dublin

Christian S. Ritter and Vladimir Kmec

ABSTRACT

This article explores how members of the German-speaking Lutheran church in Dublin develop their networks of belonging by taking part in social practices in their congregation. The article addresses the intersection of religious life, migration experience, and belonging. Based on qualitative fieldwork, we assess how social practices embedded in religious activities and beliefs reshape the sense of belonging among members of this congregation. We study the congregation through a material approach while paying attention to its actual religious and social life. The study observes how participation in the social life of the congregation enables its members to create multiple senses of belonging—ethno-cultural, religious, and social belonging. The social life of the congregation aids the preservation of immigrants' ethno-cultural particularities, societal adaptation, and sense of belonging to their religious community.

ARTICLE HISTORY

Received 4 June 2015
Accepted 15 February 2016

KEYWORDS

Immigrant congregations;
networks of belonging;
social practices; EU migrants;
German Lutherans; Ireland

Introduction

The social life of an immigrant religious congregation plays an important role in the formation of immigrants' networks of belonging. Research on migration and religion in recent years mainly focused on 'new migrants' (of the post-1990s) who are not necessarily from a European Christian background. This body of research highlighted that immigrant religious communities nourish immigrants' transnational ties and/or assist with their adaptation. Immigrant congregations often accommodate culturally and ethnically distinctive packages that help individuals to maintain ties with their homelands and to preserve their identities (e.g. Levitt 2001, 1–30, 159–216; Chafetz and Ebaugh 2002; Ebaugh and Chafetz 2002; Levitt and Nyberg-Sørensen 2004). At the same time, immigrant congregations facilitate members' adaptation (Handlin 1941; Gleason 1968; Levitt 2006, 391, 396) and provide new social roles (Warner 2000; Avalos 2004; Ling 2008). They generate social capital that can bond immigrants with their homelands and make bridges for them in the host society (Allen 2010).¹

Nevertheless, in debates on transnational connections, immigrant congregations are presented as communities of seemingly unchanging migrants and thus as ethnic enclaves.

These discourses often focus on ethno-national aspects of identity and present migrants in ethnicised terms. Such studies tend to neglect other aspects of belonging in a religious community, namely religious and social belonging. On the other hand, integration discourses tend to neglect religious practices and beliefs as well as ethnic aspects. Some scholars have emphasised the need to move the focus away from transnationalism and integration debates to avoid ethnic bias, in favour of studying immigrant communities in their natural social settings (Glick-Schiller and Caglar 2011; Vertovec 2011).

This article tells the story of the German-speaking Lutheran congregation in Dublin where we have paid attention to the impact of social practices on immigrants' sense of belonging in a more comprehensive manner. Rather than looking at transnational attachments or integration, we have studied the networks of belonging within the congregation itself. We explored how social practices within this group enhance the formation of networks of belonging among its members. We sought to understand how congregation members make sense of their religious rituals and beliefs and how this reshapes their sense of belonging within their congregation. A material approach (Warnier 2007; Gowlland 2011) was employed to research the congregation; it reveals the manifestations of its social life, such as social practices and material objects, and their ascribed symbolic meanings.

The article deals with Germans who are intra-EU migrants—people who migrate within the Schengen area but often go unnoticed by scholars of religion and migration. This case study provides a valuable example of an immigrant community that includes both permanent residents and temporary migrants. EU migrants can be expected to maintain strong ties with their homelands, due to convenient and affordable transport and free movement across EU countries (Krings et al. 2013). As EU citizens, they resemble national minorities more than migrants (Johns 2014). As our research demonstrates, the preservation of ethnic and cultural particularities or the development of a new identity is neither the primary nor the only characteristic of congregational life in this case.

Social practices and networks of belonging in immigrant congregations

Among social scientists it is widely accepted that a person's sense of belonging is influenced by social practices through which individuals construct social and cultural interpretations (Ting 2008, 465; Holland et al. 2001, 19). According to Clifford Geertz, culture can be understood as “the structures of meanings” through which individuals shape their experiences (Geertz 1973, 5). Roy Baumeister and Mark Leary claim that humans “are fundamentally and pervasively motivated by a need to belong” (Baumeister and Leary 1995, 497). Weber argued that individuals are suspended in webs of significance that they themselves weave (as quoted in Geertz 1973, 5). Religious communities can thus be understood as repositories of webs of significance. Furthermore, religion often functions as a platform for the development of binding attachments. Religion contributes to the maintenance of the social structure of a group (Gellner 2001, 18–19), uniting it into a single community (Durkheim [1915] 2001, 44). In a similar way, Thomas Tweed describes immigrants' religion as “confluences of organic channels and cultural currents that conjoin to create institutional networks that, in turn, prescribe, transmit, and transform tropes, beliefs, values, emotions, artefacts and rituals” (Tweed 2006, 69).

Immigrants' sense of belonging is not only shaped by religious beliefs and ideas of sacral contents; it also has a material dimension. The material aspects of faith practices have been studied by scholars of religion, such as Matthew Engelke (2012), Sonia Hazard (2013), and Ann Taves (2012). A faith-based community also develops a social life within its place of worship. The social life of a religious get-together becomes manifested in social practices that play a decisive role in the formation of its members' sense of belonging. The conceptualisation of social practice suggested by Elizabeth Shove, Mika Pantzar, and Matt Watson seems particularly apt for the exploration of people's sense of belonging within a faith-based community (2012, 119–134). Individuals' involvement in a set of social practices means actively combining three different elements: materials, competences, and symbolic meaning. Any objects used by believers during a religious service can be considered materials. Personal competences are displayed during the service and may include singing, praying, and preaching. Meaning is attached to all the objects and actions involved in religious rituals. As Arjun Appadurai points out, meanings are constantly attached to, and detached from, material items (1986, 3–63).

Belonging is characteristically fluid in nature and evolves through interactions in which actors negotiate their affiliations with social groups (Hall 1994; Brubaker and Cooper 2000; Burke and Stets 2003). The ability to reflect on him/herself as an object is considered to be one of the features of an individual's sense of belonging. In doing so, people make sense of symbols, events, and materials that surround them. We consider belonging as part of social identity while focusing on the interrelation between religious, ethnic, and social aspects of belongingness.² In this particular case, we attempt to understand how migrants intertwine their ethnic, social, and religious belonging within their congregation. We explore how their sense of belonging is shaped by social practices that are collectively enacted within the congregation.

The Lutheran congregation in Dublin

Although established in the seventeenth century, the Lutheran Church in Ireland predominantly accommodates first-generation migrants, with the exception of a few second-generation Germans and people of Irish descent.³ The German-speaking congregation has around 450 registered members (Lutheran Church in Ireland 2011). However, as many members are temporary migrants, the numbers vary each year (Lutheran Church in Ireland 2009). According to the most recent Irish census, conducted in 2011, approximately 11,000 Germans live in Ireland. Notably, the highest percentages of people indicating no religion in the census were from the German and Chinese minorities. While 37% of Germans in Ireland have been categorised as having no religion, 28% are listed as Catholic and 21% (2,371) indicated “other stated religions”, which include Lutherans and other Protestants (Central Statistics Office 2012a). This means that the registered members of the Lutheran Church represent no more than 19% of the German Lutherans and Protestants in Ireland. By comparison, approximately 30% of the population in Germany are Lutheran (Statistisches Bundesamt 2011). Nonetheless, German Lutherans in Ireland are more religiously active than their counterparts in Germany. The average Sunday attendance is about 13% of the registered members, which excludes members who are not based in Dublin, whereas the average attendance among Lutherans in Germany is 3.3% (EKD 2013).

The congregation mainly accommodates two groups of migrants: first-generation German migrants who have permanently settled in Ireland, some of whom have married Irish citizens and/or gained Irish citizenship, and expatriates who stay temporarily or circulate between Germany and Ireland. The socio-demographic characteristics of the congregation resemble the statistical data for the German population in Ireland. German nationals mainly work as highly skilled professionals in managerial, technical, and non-manual positions. The vast majority are employed in the business, banking, and manufacturing sectors, although some work in the health and social sectors (Central Statistics Office 2012b). While the Sunday service is the central event of congregational life, the congregation also organises other events such as German coffee meetings, ecumenical lunchtime prayers, Bible lessons, and Taizé services.

We focus on two different religious events, namely an Easter service and a Taizé service, which differ in content and purpose. Studying the two different services comparatively helps to highlight a set of social practices that create a sense of community. The two services were chosen with the intent of gaining a detailed and in-depth account of the interrelation between social practices and belonging. They were selected on the basis of rigorous coding procedures regarding our data to exemplify patterns of practices. Similar social practices evolved during numerous other events that were observed.

In our analysis, we draw on a range of materials such as field notes and interview transcripts. We carried out fieldwork in various sites of the Lutheran Church as part of our respective doctoral research projects between 2009 and 2014. During this period, we also studied other immigrant religious communities in Ireland and Germany. Although we conducted our research independently in the same community largely over the same period, our disciplines differ; therefore, we focused on different topics and conceptual frameworks. We employed various qualitative interview techniques, such as life story and semi-structured interviews. We included all types of first-generation migrants in our sample. Fifteen members of the Lutheran Church, aged between 22 and 61, participated in the life story interview conducted by the first author. The second author carried out 15 semi-structured interviews with members ranging from 25 to 64 years of age, some of which evolved into life story interviews. In addition, we conducted interviews with the two pastors of the church. Since we studied different topics, different sets of questions were used: Christian Ritter raised autobiographic questions about life phases while Vladimir Kmec focused on the formation of religious identities. The interviews lasted between one and four hours depending on circumstances and particular requirements. Participant observations were mainly conducted during the services of the congregation, but also took place during church outings, church coffee sessions, and informal gatherings.

In order to mitigate any limitations and enhance the integrity of our research, we decided to present our outcomes together to facilitate a discussion across our field experiences (Guion, Diehl, and McDonald 2011). We shared the most relevant data and reflected intensively on the differences and similarities of our field experiences. This investigator triangulation raises the trustworthiness of our claims as the congregation was studied from different perspectives and we took on different roles during our fieldwork. As a German native speaker, Christian Ritter was more of an insider, which, as he comes from a Catholic background, enabled him to maintain a balanced relationship with this Lutheran community. Vladimir Kmec was an outsider in terms of his nationality. However, as a Lutheran minister and fluent German speaker, he was able to build sufficient trust among the congregation.

For the purpose of this article, we analysed a number of selected interviews with people attending the two services from our two data sets while identifying narratives relevant to the issues of belonging and social practices. The data were analysed in accordance with the procedures of grounded theory (Strauss and Corbin 1998). The selection of services and interview passages in this article is based on open coding of the collected material. The patterns we identified were sufficiently saturated so that no new information emerged during the analysis. Our analysis is presented in the form of “thick descriptions” (Geertz 1973, 6) and the selected interview passages reflect the diversity of the congregation in terms of gender, age, and duration of stay in the country. The names of respondents were replaced by pseudonyms to ensure confidentiality. Interviews were conducted in German and the selected passages were translated into English.

The Easter service

A Lutheran Easter service was chosen for detailed analysis because it illustrates how members of the congregation interpret some of the core practices of the Lutheran belief system. The following account is based on a slightly revised field note, the script of the Easter sermon (Lutheran Church Ireland 2011, 1), an explanation of the Order of Service (Lutheran Church Ireland 1999, 9), and an in-depth interview with a participant. During Easter 2011, two services were held in the church in Dublin. The ‘Sunrise Service’ started at 5:00 am so that approximately 25 attendees could experience the dawn. An estimated 60 people attended the second Easter service, which was scheduled for 11:00 am. Most attendees lived in or near Dublin. On these two occasions, the pastor wore a black robe with a white collar, which holds two symbolic meanings for German Lutherans in Ireland. On the one hand, this traditional clerical robe reminds German Lutherans of their origins and traditions; on the other hand, it reflects the conventional character of the traditional Lutheran church service with its formal and standardised liturgy.

The pastor personally welcomed each of the attendees at the church entrance. Anticipating a high number of attendees, the service was thoroughly prepared. A songbook and a little booklet with a drawing of St. Finian’s Lutheran Church were distributed to those attending. The liturgy comprised three major elements: the Opening, the Service of the Word, and the Celebration of the Eucharist (Lutheran Church Ireland 1999, 10). These elements symbolically correspond with the bodily existence of the faithful, as described in the booklet. In the Opening, heart and mouth were represented in the prayers and hymns. Ear and mind played their part in the Service of the Word, which included the sermon. Other sensory metaphors appeared in the Celebration of the Eucharist. Similar to other Lutheran services, the Easter service sermon took the lives of the German residents into consideration. This preaching practice during the service is important for the formation of networks of belonging. Believers could easily identify with the local community and feel at home in the congregation, as the service was held in German and the sermons contained numerous references to the lives of congregational members.

Susanne, 32 years old when interviewed, moved from Germany to Ireland in 2001 and founded her own business in Dublin, where she lives with her German partner. She drew support from her experiences at the Lutheran Church as it enabled her to connect with other churchgoers:

The German community has become a sort of a big family to me because it is relatively small in Dublin. You get to talk to people fast... The German aspect is crucial. Because we speak German and because we have the belief as a common ground... My friends [from the congregation] mean more to me than back in Germany, where the family was most important. (Dublin, 5 May 2011)

This participant welcomed the opportunity to attend a service spoken in the German language. Participating in the same religious rituals that take place in the home country can create a sense of belonging among the church members. This sense of belonging, stimulated during the service by the various stories about German immigrants in Ireland, is reinforced during the subsequent get-together.

The final significant part of the service was devoted to the celebration of the Eucharist. This highly sacramental section of the service began with a prayer in preparation for the Holy Communion. According to the booklet distributed at the beginning of the service, God is symbolised in the bread and wine received by believers. After the congregation had said the Lord's Prayer, the faithful were invited to come forward and receive Communion, which was distributed by the two pastors and an assistant. As the Easter service was well attended, believers wishing to receive Communion stood in two large circles while holding hands. The Communion ended with a final hymn and prayer. Finally, the pastor informed the attendees of the subsequent get-together in the church garden, where a table with cake, coffee, and tea was already laid. The church coffee, as it is known, allowed congregation members to chat and exchange their experiences in the Irish capital. For new members, these events were often a welcome opportunity to make contact with long-term residents of Dublin and to elicit information about accommodation, employment opportunities, and leisure activities. In so doing, members built networks of belonging and felt part of the local community. The intertwining of Lutheran beliefs and secular events in Ireland creates a particular social space in which the religious and ethnic identity layers of church members merge into a new identity: German-Lutheran Dubliners.

The ethnographic account has described how an Easter service unfolded in the German-speaking Lutheran Church. Aside from celebrating Christian beliefs, the narrative of the service contains clear evidence of the identity development of its members. The description of some of the Lutheran services is therefore followed by an interpretation of their effect on identity formation. The analysis of the Easter service brought to light a number of social practices that are considered to affect the identity formation of Lutherans. Significantly, German is spoken in the vast majority of situations. Illustrating the close transnational ties between the Lutheran Church in Ireland and the German Lutheran Church, the Dublin-based pastors are short-listed by the Central Office of the German Lutheran Church in Hanover and elected by the local church council. The pastors usually move to Ireland for a pre-determined term, which can be up to eight years. This appointment strategy ensures that the pastors have recent experience of the Lutheran congregational life in Germany and can easily refer to the homeland in the native tongue. This policy ensures the sustainability of transnational ties through which not only religious but also ethnic (national), linguistic, and cultural particularities are fostered.

The description of the service also indicates how a fusion of two different identity layers takes shape within the Lutheran circles. On the one hand, the Lutheran service is a religious event that provides believers with a spiritual context and interpretation of their existence; on the other hand, it suggests an interpretation of their secular lives and destinies in Ireland. The fact that the service was held in German prompted nostalgic memories in some members who had visited Lutheran churches in Germany. This was most pertinent to irregular churchgoers who, in the main, only attended church services during the major Christian festivals (Christmas and Easter). The sermons and other elements of the service, such as collective praying, create a local community consisting of people who primarily share two characteristics: their German origins and a common interest in Lutheranism. The pastors, church council, and many volunteers have created a local system capable of producing a cornucopia of symbolic meanings. Such symbols signify the various aspects of the Lutheran Church life, ranging from the architectural symbolism of the church edifice to the analogy between the body of the believers and the various sections of the service. Regular church attendees internalise these symbols while making sense of their existence in Ireland. The collective feeling of belonging to a specific community is reinforced by the social get-together following the liturgical elements of the service. Participation in the service enables congregation members to develop personal identity layers, which differ from the majority population in Ireland, but are also distinct from German immigrants who have joined other local faith-based communities in Dublin.

The Taizé service

Although there were two failed attempts to launch Taizé services⁴ in the Church in the mid-1990s, over the last decade or so, they have become an important part of the Lutheran congregation in Dublin with the arrival of a younger generation in their twenties and thirties. The initiators of the Taizé services in the Dublin congregation attended the Taizé community in France, with some of them also familiar with Taizé worship in Germany. Although Taizé services are popular among Lutherans in Germany, although not always fully incorporated into church life, many attendees of the Dublin congregation were unfamiliar with the service.

This article focuses on a particular Taizé service during Advent in December 2011, attended by 14 people.⁵ That evening, candles were arranged in the shape of a cross in the chancel of the church. Two icons, unusual in the Lutheran tradition, were placed against the communion rails. Participants sat in silence on cushions around the candles, forming a semi-circle. The atmosphere evoked a sense of calmness, contemplation, and togetherness.

For many Lutherans who attend the service, Taizé worship has become a new element in their religious practice. For Klaus, aged 52, a permanent resident of Ireland since 1990,

Taizé has become my personal spirituality—a lot of silence, contemplative way of praying, and meditation, hymns, mantra-like form of immersion. (Dublin, 19 January 2012)

Although Klaus was familiar with Taizé worship when he lived in Germany, it only became a significant part of his spiritual life in Dublin. Through the Taizé service, during which icons are presented, Klaus also started to cherish the Orthodox tradition as a spiritual resource. Some members who were previously unfamiliar with Taizé worship also embraced this new practice as a significant part of their religious lives. An example is Miriam, aged 32, who had moved to Ireland in 2004:

Taizé is very important for me. [...] It is important to have this chance to think in calmness [...] to have the opportunity for silence in the church. [...] it is a resource of power for me where one can be naked, without any big liturgy. (Dublin, 6 May 2012)

Although the Sunday service with classical hymns and church organ remains the core rite of the congregation, some members, regardless of age, are open to new religious practices. Similar to most, although not all participants, Klaus and Miriam consider Taizé worship as complementing rather than replacing Sunday services. The popularity of this service among many church members corresponds with Stephen Warner's research on the role of immigrant congregations as enabling personal religious transformation (Warner 2000). While such a transformation is not only limited to immigrant churches, interviewees highlighted that it was their immigration experience—new experiences and intercultural encounters—that heightened their search for deeper spirituality and openness to new religious practices. They pointed to the differences between their conventional religious lives in Germany and their active religious lives in Ireland. As Klaus and Miriam stated,

The move to Ireland was, for me, a religious move at the same time. [...] Abraham's story—this is something that I experience on my own. [...] The climate here—where 'wind' is blowing in your face—I do not feel the same in Germany. [...] [In Scotland] I already learned about the Celtic spirituality—close to nature, the celebration of life, ritual religiousness. (Dublin, 19 January 2012)

It [Taizé worship in the Lutheran Church] is a place where people of different faiths can come. [...] Faith is important, not the appearance—small denominational differences. I became aware of this only here in Ireland. I come from a small village congregation in Germany where there was no other church except ours. [...] Here, one can find many different congregations. (Dublin, 6 May 2012)

During the service, hymns and chants were sung repeatedly in Latin, English, German or other languages, accompanied by guitar and flute. A text from the Bible was read in English and German. The prayer time was an important moment during which participants said their prayers out loudly and openly. The liturgy of the Eucharist was read by a lay person and the consecrated bread and wine were passed from one participant to the next, which is unusual to many Lutherans. In contrast, during the Easter service, bread and wine were consecrated and distributed by the ministers with the help of an assistant. The simplicity and non-conformity make this service attractive to both young and older members of the church. The service does not include any sermon. As Chris, 38 years old, who moved to Ireland in 2006 and returned to Germany last year, framed it:

[Taizé worship] is, for me, my most preferred and most popular religious service and way of praying—simply because it is so simple, because it contains moments of silence, and because it can be done by anyone. (Dublin, 12 January 2012)

The Taizé service has renegotiated the conventional character of the Sunday service and other more formal religious celebrations, such as the Easter service. Traditionally, the congregation sits in the church pews during services; however, in a more relaxed fashion, during the Taizé service, people are invited to sit or kneel in the chancel. The service is organised by lay people, without the involvement of the clergy, and the pastors do not wear their black clerical robes. These findings correspond with previous research that emphasised the decreasing role of conventional forms of religiosity (Davie 1994, 2000, 20, 2002, 8, 147–148; Higgins 2013; Marti and Ganiel 2014, 5–33, 109–132).

Nevertheless, some similarities with the Easter service can be observed. Participants help with practicalities, such as collecting hymn books, candles, and cushions and preparing tea and coffee. The service was followed by a get-together over a cup of coffee or tea, which provided an opportunity to engage in conversation with friends and to meet new people. The social aspects of these practices are important in building the sense of community and togetherness. Although the service marks the development of a de-ethnicised religiosity, the sense of ethnic and cultural belonging is still important to some participants. The fact that the service takes place in the Lutheran church building and is conducted in German is a significant factor in people's motivation. Even those for whom Taizé worship had become a principal part of their religious lives expressed the need to practise their faith in a form characteristic to Lutherans. For example, Chris noted:

I sometimes miss there [in Taizé worship] a sermon or a lesson focusing on the explanation of a biblical reading such as it is done in a church service. Obviously, this cannot be found in Taizé services. But Taizé services have become for me a replacement for a church service. This means that I do not necessarily have to attend a church service on Sunday again. (Dublin, 12 January 2012)

Chris's statement exemplifies how immigrants negotiate their own tradition and a new practice. While attending both Taizé and Sunday services, he sought to create some overlap in his two identifications.

The Taizé service demonstrates how an immigrant congregation can adopt new practices that renegotiate immigrants' sense of belonging. The attendees of this service are not exclusively focused on cultivating their ethnically and culturally bounded religious traditions. They embrace and combine different and new practices within their own religious tradition. Similarly, as Ryan Allen observed in his research, the role of this Lutheran congregation can be described in terms of both bonding and bridging social capital (Allen 2010). In addition to the cultivation of their transnational ties, by participating in Taizé services, these congregants embraced practices that are not confined to a particular ethnicity.

Conclusion

The social practices that take place within different religious rituals in the German-speaking Lutheran congregation in Dublin influence the formation of networks of belonging among its members. This article has looked at social practices during an Easter service and a Taizé service. The in-depth analysis of the Easter service indicates that the Lutheran congregation has developed a number of social practices that affect its members' sense of belonging. Although the tradition-oriented practices, such as singing and preaching in the Easter service, foster the cultivation of the ethnic, cultural, and linguistic particularities of this community, other social practices, such as the social get-togethers, are also significant for the development of the congregation as a network of belonging. The example of the Taizé service shows that migrants can be open to new religious practices. Although perceived as unconventional by many members, Taizé services, too, can help sustain ethnic and religious particularities and foster social interaction. Despite the fact that the two practices vary in form, they are compatible in the impact they have on the formation of immigrants' sense of belonging.

We observed that it is not only the relationships as such, but also the contents and settings of social practices within the religious life of a congregation that contribute to community formation. We identified two main reasons why the Lutheran congregation influences the formation of German immigrants' sense of belonging. Firstly, social practices are constantly enacted and the participation in the congregational life enables members to create a sustained feeling of 'us' and a sense of community. Secondly, social practices in the congregation provide its members with means of making sense of their lives and beliefs, which are shaped by their migration experiences. The social practices of the congregation form a social force that believers use to seek explanations for their own destinies. The construction of members' sense of belonging is closely linked to the community formation process.

As far as immigration experiences are concerned, the members of the congregation undergo a change of their personal belonging in the first instance. Having left their country of origin, they maintain an emotional attachment to Germany. The new experiences in Ireland challenge their previous self-image. Over time, the members of the Lutheran congregation in the Irish capital develop a new sense of belonging with two layers. The first layer consists of the symbolic meanings that are attached to their ethnic identification. Their ethnic identification is, however, intertwined with the religious layer. For most of the German-born members, the Lutheran Church is one of the few places where they can maintain parts of their German identity. Nevertheless, their belonging to the German-speaking congregation is reshaped by new religious practices. The congregation has established a system of symbolic meanings that enables members collectively to make sense of their lives in their new home. The ethnic and religious layers merge during congregational life and new ethno-religious connotations of belonging arise.

Our observations confirm previous research highlighting that a religious congregation can initiate a community life that enables its members to create a sense of belonging. Nevertheless, we did not only focus on ethnic and cultural bonds or on integration. We explored the formation of networks of belonging in this particular congregation in its multifaceted ways. The two events analysed comprise three different but overlapping aspects. Firstly, religious events produce and re-produce various religious contents that strengthen and/or renegotiate members' religious beliefs and practices. Secondly, the use of the German language and the specific Lutheran-based content of the activities help sustain ethnic, national, and cultural bonds, while members adjust to life in the new country. Thirdly, the activities also have a socialising function while creating a platform for the exchange of information and the development of social networks. As a result, participation in religious events facilitates the development and realisation of a sense of belonging that is three-fold: religious belonging, ethno-cultural belonging, and belonging to a particular community. The multifaceted nature of the networks of belonging in this congregation demonstrates that individuals' as well as the group's belonging and/or identity are not static, but dynamic and constantly evolving. In addition, our findings challenge the literature on transnational migration that tends to present the identities of religious migrants in homogeneous and ethnicised terms.

It is important to acknowledge that an individual's sense of belonging to and networks of belonging within a community can change in the course of time. Our research focused on a specific period in the lives of the members of this congregation. Future research should investigate the formation of individuals' sense of belonging to a religious community over their life courses and the extent to which patterns and modes of belonging are sustained within a congregation. In terms of theoretical frameworks, the findings of this research suggest that scholars of religion should examine more intensively the intersection of social practices, belonging, and religion while considering both the functional and the substantive role of religion.

Notes

1. The concept of bonding versus bridging social capital was introduced by Robert Putnam (2000).
2. While sociologists refer to belonging as an aspect of identity (Bauman 2004), anthropologists view it as a basic human need (Baumeister and Leary 1995). Linking both perspectives, Sheila Croucher claims that identities are “belonging formations” (Croucher 2004, 39). Ethnicity and religion can be fused in one’s identity (Barot 1993, 5). Immigrant religious congregations serve as ideal platforms for this fusion (Bankston and Zhou 1995, 523). In this research, we use James Beckford’s approach to religion, which looks at what religion means in terms of social interaction and at its significance in particular social settings. Beckford suggests focusing on the religious meanings that individuals attribute to situations, actions, feelings, and ideas (Beckford 2003, 16–20).

3. The Lutheran Church in Ireland has only one mother parish in Dublin: St. Finian’s Church. Since most members come from Germany, services are held mainly in German, although an English-speaking branch is also part of the congregation. Services in German also take place in Sligo, Galway, Limerick, Killarney, Cork, Wexford, Castlepollard, and Belfast. With the EU enlargement in 2004, the church premises also came to be used by the Latvian and Polish congregations.
4. Taizé services follow the liturgy of the Taizé community, an ecumenical monastic order in France. A typical Taizé worship service includes hymns based on simple phrases sung repeatedly or in canon in different languages, a recitation of religious texts, prayers, and meditations.
5. Since 2004, the Taizé services have taken place on Thursdays. Since then, the services have been renamed Thursday Prayers. During the fieldwork, a Taizé service was usually attended by around 10 and occasionally by up to 20 people.

Acknowledgements

This work was supported by a Vice-Chancellor’s Research Scholarship awarded to the first author by Ulster University and a Government of Ireland Postgraduate Scholarship granted to the second author by the Irish Research Council. We would like to express our gratitude to members of the Lutheran Church in Ireland who participated in this research. We are also thankful to Prof. Máiréad Nic Craith and Dr Gladys Ganiel for their support during our research as well as to the two anonymous reviewers of the Journal of Contemporary Religion for their comments.

Disclosure statement

No potential conflict of interest was reported by the authors.

Notes on contributors

Christian S. Ritter is a post-doctoral fellow in the Department of Social Anthropology at the Norwegian University of Science and Technology in Trondheim, Norway.

Vladimir Kmec is a Government of Ireland post-doctoral research fellow at the School of Politics and International Relations at the University College Dublin, Ireland, and a Research Associate at the Von Hügel Institute at the University of Cambridge, UK.

CORRESPONDENCE: Vladimir Kmec, UCD School of Politics and International Relations, Newman Building, Belfield, Dublin 4, Ireland.

ORCID

Christian S. Ritter <http://orcid.org/0000-0001-7394-2646>

Vladimir Kmec <http://orcid.org/0000-0003-4522-8853>

References

- Allen, Ryan. 2010. "The Bonding and Bridging Roles of Religious Institutions for Refugees in a Non-gateway Context." Ethnic and Racial Studies 33 (6): 1049–1068.
- Appadurai, Arjun. 1986. "Commodities and the Politics of Value." In The Social Life of Things: Commodities in Cultural Perspective, edited by Arjun Appadurai, 3–63. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Avalos, Hector, ed. 2004. Introduction to the U.S. Latina and Latino Religious Experience. Boston: Brill.
- Bankston, Carl L. III, and Min Zhou. 1995. "Religious Participation, Ethnic Identification, and Adaptation of Vietnamese Adolescents in an Immigrant Community." The Sociological Quarterly 36 (3): 523–534.
- Barot, Rohit. 1993. "Religion, Ethnicity and Social Change: An Introduction." In Religion and Ethnicity: Minorities and Social Change in the Metropolis, edited by Rohit Barot, 1–16. Kampen: Kok Pharos.
- Bauman, Zygmunt. 2004. Identity: Conversations with Benedetto Vecchi. Cambridge: Polity.
- Baumeister, Roy F., and Mark R. Leary. 1995. "The Need to Belong: Desire for Interpersonal Attachments as a Fundamental Human Motivation." Psychological Bulletin 117 (3): 497–529.
- Beckford, James A. 2003. Social Theory and Religion. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Brubaker, Rogers, and Frederick Cooper. 2000. "Beyond 'Identity'." Theory and Society 29 (1): 1–47.
- Burke, Peter J., and Jan E. Stets. 2003. "A Sociological Approach to Self and Identity." In Handbook of Self and Identity, edited by Mark R. Leary and June Price Tangney, 128–152. New York: The Guilford Press.
- Central Statistics Office. 2012a. Profile 6: Migration and Diversity. Dublin: Stationery Office Ireland. Accessed 14 December 2012. <http://census.cso.ie/Census>
- Central Statistics Office. 2012b. Profile 7: Religion, Ethnicity and Irish Travellers. Dublin: Stationery Office Ireland. Accessed 13 July 2015. <http://cso.ie/en/media/csoie/census/documents/census2011profile7/Profile,7,Education,Ethnicity,and,Irish,Traveller,entire,doc.pdf>
- Chafetz, Janet Saltzman, and Helen Rose F. Ebaugh. 2002. "The Variety of Transnational Religious Networks." In Religion across Borders: Transnational Immigrant Networks, edited by Helen Rose F. Ebaugh and Janet Saltzman Chafetz, 165–192. Walnut Creek, CA: Alta Mira.
- Croucher, Sheila L. 2004. Globalization and Belonging: The Politics of Identity in a Changing World. Oxford: Rowman & Littlefield.
- Davie, Grace. 1994. Religion in Britain since 1945: Believing without Belonging. Oxford: Blackwell.
- Davie, Grace. 2000. "Patterns of Change in European Religion." In Religion and Politics: East-West Contrasts from Contemporary Europe, edited by Tom Inglis, Zdzisław Mach, and Rafał Mazanek, 15–30. Dublin: UCD Press.
- Davie, Grace. 2002. Europe: The Exceptional Case. Parameters of Faith in the Modern World. London: Darton, Longman & Todd.
- Durkheim, Emile. (1915) 2001. The Elementary Forms of the Religious Life. Translated by Carol Cosman. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Ebaugh, Helen Rose F., and Janet Saltzman Chafetz. 2002. "Introduction." In Religion across Borders: Transnational Immigrant Networks, edited by Helen Rose F. Ebaugh and Janet Saltzman Chafetz, 1–14. Walnut Creek, CA: Alta Mira.
- EKD (Evangelische Kirche Deutschland). 2013. EKD Statistik: Gottesdienst und Abendmahl. Accessed 31 July 2015. <https://www.ekd.de/statistik/gottesdienst.html>
- Engelke, Matthew. 2012. "Material Religion." In The Cambridge Companion to Religious Studies, edited by Robert Orsi, 209–229. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Geertz, Clifford. 1973. "Thick Description: Toward an Interpretive Theory of Culture." In The Interpretation of Cultures: Selected Essays, edited by Clifford Geertz, 3–31. New York: Basic Books.
- Gellner, David N. 2001. "Anthropological Approaches." In Approaches to the Study of Religion, edited by Peter Connolly, 10–41. 2nd ed. London: Continuum.
- Gleason, Philip. 1968. The Conservative Reformers: German-American Catholics and the Social Order. Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press.
- Glick-Schiller, Nina, and Ayse Caglar. 2011. Locating Migration: Rescaling Cities and Migrants. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press.
- Gowlland, Geoffrey. 2011. "The 'Matière à Penser' Approach to Material Culture: Objects, Subjects and the Materiality of the Self." Journal of Material Culture 16 (3): 337–343.

- Guion, Lisa, David Diehl, and Debra McDonald. 2011. Triangulation: Establishing the Validity of Qualitative Studies. Working Paper. Gainesville, FL: Department of Family, Youth and Community Sciences, University of Florida.
- Hall, Stuart. 1994. "Cultural Identity and Diaspora." In Colonial Discourse and Post-colonial Theory: A Reader, edited by Patrick Williams and Laura Chrisman, 392–403. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Handlin, Oscar. 1941. Boston's Immigrants, 1790–1865: A Study in Acculturation. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Hazard, Sonia. 2013. "The Material Turn in the Study of Religion." Religion and Society: Advances in Research 4 (1): 58–78.
- Higgins, Cathy. 2013. Churches in Exile: An Exploration of Alternative Models of Church for a 21st Century Ireland. Dublin: Columba Press.
- Holland, Dorothy, Debra Skinner, William Lachicotte Jr, and Carole Cain. 2001. Identity and Agency in Cultural Worlds. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Johns, Michael. 2014. The New Minorities in Europe: Social Cohesion in the European Union. Plymouth, KY: Lexington.
- Krings, Torben, Elaine Moriarty, James Wickham, and Alicja Bobek. 2013. New Mobilities in Europe: Polish Migration to Ireland Post-2004. Manchester: Manchester University Press.
- Levitt, Peggy. 2001. The Transnational Villagers. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.
- Levitt, Peggy. 2006. "Immigration." In Handbook of Religion and Social Institutions, edited by Helen Rose Ebaugh, 391–410. New York: Springer.
- Levitt, Peggy, and Ninna Nyberg-Sørensen. 2004. "The Transnational Turn in Migration Studies." Report. Global Migration Perspectives 6. Geneva: Global Commission on International Migration.
- Ling, Huping, ed. 2008. Emerging Voices: Experiences of Underrepresented Asian Americans. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press.
- Lutheran Church Ireland. 1999. "Introduction to Order of Service." In The Service of the Lutheran Church in Ireland/Hauptgottesdienst der Evangelisch-Lutherischen Kirche in Irland, edited by Lutheran Church Ireland, 9–11. Dublin: Lutheran Church Ireland.
- Lutheran Church in Ireland. 2009. Membership Application for the Lutheran Church in Ireland. Dublin: Lutheran Church in Ireland.
- Lutheran Church Ireland. 2011. "Predigt zu Ostern! [Easter Sermon!]" Accessed 27 September 2012. <http://www.lutheran-ireland.org>
- Marti, Gerardo, and Gladys Ganiel. 2014. The Deconstructed Church: Understanding Emerging Christianity. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Putnam, Robert D. 2000. Bowling Alone: The Collapse and Revival of American Community. New York: Simon and Schuster.
- Shove, Elizabeth, Mika Pantzar, and Matt Watson. 2012. The Dynamics of Social Practice: Everyday Life and How it Changes. London: Sage.
- Statistisches Bundesamt. 2011. Ausgewählte soziodemografische Daten (Erwerbstätigkeit, Bildung, Migration, Religion). Accessed 31 July 2015. https://www.destatis.de/DE/PresseService/Presse/Pressekonferenzen/2013/Zensus2011/soziodemo_excel.html
- Strauss, Anselm, and Juliet Corbin. 1998. Basics of Qualitative Research: Techniques and Procedures for Developing Grounded Theory. London: Sage.
- Taves, Ann. 2012. "Special Things as Building Blocks of Religious." In The Cambridge Companion to Religious Studies, edited by Robert Orsi, 58–83. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Ting, Helen. 2008. "Social Construction of Nation: A Theoretical Exploration." Nationalism and Ethnic Politics 14 (3): 453–482.
- Tweed, Thomas A. 2006. Crossing and Dwelling: A Theory of Religion. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Vertovec, Steven. 2011. Anthropology of Migration and Multiculturalism: New Directions. London: Routledge.
- Warnier, Jean-Pierre. 2007. The Pot-king: The Body and Technologies of Power. Leiden: Brill.
- Warner, R. Stephen. 2000. "Religion and New (Post-1965) Immigrants: Some Principles Drawn from Field Research." American Studies 41 (2): 267–286.