About the author

Kun He obtained his PhD from the Centre for Media and Journalism Studies at the University of Groningen, where he focused his research on Chinese bottom-up populism in online contexts. His research primarily explores the concept of populism, the individuals involved, and the discursive logic employed during bottom-up populist online expression. He has published numerous articles in academic journals, including the International Journal of Communication and the Chinese Journal of Communication, which align with his PhD research.

Kun completed his MA in Social Linguistics and his BA in Applied Linguistics at Wuhan University and Guangzhou University, respectively, where he became interested in conceptual metaphor. After that, he worked as a researcher at Communication University of China for three years, with a primary focus on political discourse and conceptual metaphor and investigating how political discourse is constructed metaphorically. Currently, Kun serves as a postdoctoral researcher at the Computational Linguistic Group at the University of Groningen, concentrating on the sector plan, which involves the intersection of Human AI, digital technology, and politics.
